About The Conference:

Sustainable development requires solutions that address environmental, economic, social, technological, and institutional challenges in an integrated manner. The National Conference on "Interdisciplinary Research Methodology for Sustainable Development", organized around the vision of Resilience Future, provides a platform for researchers, academicians, policymakers, practitioners, and students to exchange ideas and explore innovative approaches to building a sustainable and resilient society.

The conference emphasizes the importance of interdisciplinary research, recognizing that complex sustainability issues cannot be effectively addressed through a single academic discipline. Combining perspectives from social sciences, natural sciences, technology, economics, management, education, and public policy can generate more comprehensive and practical solutions.

The conference will focus on research methodologies that support evidence-based decision-making, innovation, community participation, and resilience. It aims to encourage research that contributes to the Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs) while addressing emerging challenges such as climate change, resource scarcity, social inequality, technological transformation, and disaster resilience.

By bringing together diverse disciplines and stakeholders, the conference seeks to strengthen collaborative research and promote knowledge that can translate into practical strategies for a sustainable and resilient future.
